Start-up helps fight mosquitoes

A product developed in a University of Florida lab designed to protect American soldiers from insect-borne diseases is helping wage war against the sudden increase of mosquitoes in areas hardest hit by Hurricane Ian.

The Inzecto Mosquito Trap, co-created by Phil Koehler, a distinguished UF professor in the department of entomology and nematology, is an easy-to-use, environmentally friendly, and effective mosquito-killing device. 1... Those local groups keep struggling with large populations of mosquitoes due to the floodwaters left behind by the hurricane's rain and storm surges.

"The Inzecto trap is designed to provide protection and relief from mosquitoes after major weather events like Ian where there is limited or no power," said Koehler. "The trap does not need electricity to work – it only needs to be filled with water, placed in shade and left undisturbed. There is no spraying or zapping. 2... He assured of no threat to those species.

The traps have been used in four Florida counties, including Orange, Lee, Charlotte and Collier. The $2.3-million donation supplements the counties' efforts with air and ground assaults through their mosquito control divisions. 3...

Koehler, who invented the trap in UF's urban entomology laboratory with involvement from other UF science and engineering professors, claims that the commercialization and formation of Inzecto Mosquito Traps are a culmination of about 10 years of research.

"We took what we know about mosquitoes and what attracts them to create the perfect trap for pests," he said.

The Inzecto Mosquito Trap is made of partially recycled and fully recyclable plastic with ribbed sides.

4... The trap requires minimal maintenance and is simply activated by adding water. The females enter the trap to lay their eggs and 100% of the mosquito larvae are killed by the micro-dose coating of insecticides imbedded into the plastic.

Orange County Extension Director Kevin Camm informs that several areas in Orlando received an influx of water from the hurricane, and nearly a month later, they still face floodwaters and continued rainfall.

"When you have this much standing water, you are going to get large populations of mosquitoes," he said. 5... -he mentioned and added: „ The county is grateful for the “friendly” donation of Inzecto's mosquito traps”. “We are very happy to have UF-patented technology help our community, they will last for months and right into the dry season.”

- a) „Beneficial insects like bees and other pollinators are not attracted to the trap.”
- b) The Gainesville-based company donated 100,000 traps this week to communities
- c) “We need to get rid of them as quickly as possible because not only are they a nuisance, but they also carry disease.”
- d) Inzecto has joined forces with partners, mosquito control districts and county parks and recreation centres to distribute the devices.
- e) The start-up was a quick failure.
- f) Its red and black colours are highly preferred by resting and egg-laying female mosquitoes that bite.
- g) Both professors doubt whether it will succeed.
